Drug Makers Adopt 'Benching' Model to Address Attrition

Hyderabad: Alarmed by attrition rates as high as 25%, several drug makers in India, both local companies and multinationals with operations here, are devising novel 'benching' models to manage employee turnover.

These firms are increasingly joining hands with recruitment process outsourcing (RPO) companies to maintain a pool of readily available people with specialisation in R&D and marketing so that they could fill up a position within a week of it falling vacant. RPOs are offering these 'benching' services to manufacturers such as Novartis, Abbott, Pfizer, Lupin, Sun Pharma and Mankind.

Sources in RPOs said the drugmakers are worried about rising attrition rates that could hamper their growth, and are accordingly availing of their services for quick hiring. The Indian pharmaceutical market reported growth of 13% in fiscal 2015 at around ₹90,000 crore. "Bench concept means keeping buffer or additional resources with anticipation of more business demand or to manage attrition. A pool of experienced applicants is created through passive or active hiring and this pool is absorbed based on the demand," said Hussain Tinwala, assistant VP at Team-Lease, a provider of HR services.

According to Tinwala, it has been a volume game for medicine manufacturers post the 2013 drug price control order, with an extended reach to small cities. "In the pharmaceutical industry, any position vacant in a territory is a loss of business to the organisation. Firms are now recruiting more people within a territory segment to ensure the business continuity. The bench model reduces the time spent on the entire hiring cycle in case of exigencies," he said.
